Overview of traffic

While the international sector performed well for MAHB's network of airports (including Istanbul SGIA), there was some decline in the domestic sector for airports in Malaysia. Despite the overall credible average load factor of 75.6 percentage points for the domestic sector, there was significant reduction in the domestic aircraft movements for Malaysia by some domestic airlines. AirAsia did contribute a large increase in seat capacity for domestic sector but less than adequate to cover the reductions and cancellations by other airlines.

Apart from the large cuts in frequencies, the decline in passenger movements registered from the domestic sector was also partly due to the high traffic base in March 2017 due to LIMA (Langkawi International Maritime and Aerospace Exhibition) in Langkawi. All the Peninsula airports recorded declines for domestic traffic while most of Sabah and Sarawak airports recorded positives. The anticipated much higher movements for domestic sector during election period has been less promising. It is expected that the domestic trend would pick up momentum from April 2018 or at the least by May 2018 based on high prevailing load factors and airlines seat capacity filings for the Northern Summer Season.

The contribution by the international sector remains buoyant both for Malaysia and Istanbul SGIA. For the Malaysia operations there was close to 2000 additional flight movements for March 2018 supporting the international sector. Most of the local and foreign airlines contributed to the international passenger growth. Apart from KLIA the four regional international airports performed exceptionally well in the international sector for March. North East Asia, South East Asia and South Asia region registered a double-digit growth over March 2017. Twenty-five airlines registered double digit growth in passenger movements. Passenger traffic between Malaysia and countries such as China, India, Turkey and Indonesia recorded growth between 16% and 22% over March 2017.

Moving forward some moderation in international growth is likely while a positive turnaround in the domestic sector for Malaysia operations is foreseen. Istanbul SGIA performance will likely maintain its growth momentum for both domestic and international passenger traffic in the immediate term.
